This is an anthology of writing--fiction, creative nonfiction and poetry--by thirty young women between the ages of 13 and 19. They are writing about the real world, as they experience it, and also their imagined world, as they conceive it. It's raw, honest and passionate, a potent testament to the power, wisdom and maturity of teenage girls, collectively asserting their voice.

Every form of tyranny opposes the human spirit of freedom; and every human being of sound mind knows that any force that dares to dictate our inner feelings and thinking is unwelcome. Waves of tyranny could be felt everywhere, even within a family in which a parent dictates the life of his or her children, not out of love and reason but out of ignorance about the true nature of right and good. It could happen at our workplaces, in bad neighborhoods... Yet, most of the time, we could avoid fear from some coincidental tyranny; however, fear caused by political tyranny is the worst of all evils and very difficult to get rid of.
